

Duality

The fire in the sky lit upon a large cloud over the foothills. It was a massive water-heavy thing that caught the sun's rays as they passed over the mountains and then bounced them down to back-light this lone tree.

The sunlight made the cloud look like it was a giant, snow-covered, cloud-shaped rainbow, set aflame by some sort of internal arsonist.

Even then, and especially in retrospect, it's easy to see the irony of the idea of fire included in this picture's principal description. The cloud is, and always has been, a water element, and provides at least half of the life-force for the tree. Naturally, the other half IS the sun, and if fire gets too close to the tree the chemical reaction shifts, and photosynthesis no longer occurs within its leaves.

Instead it might burn up and create flame for the sky to swallow.

Water, however, could prevent that. It is the all-encompassing necessity.

Everything needs Water.

Even Photographers.

(thirsty)

(Aaah. That's Better)